A correspondent writes from Wallace, New Mexico: When Senor Coronado, of Spain, he of the pointed beard, and who rode a strong white charger, marched up the Valley of the Rio Grande river, in New Mexico, he found a succession of those peculiarly-constructed Indian villages which are known to-day as pueblos. As they appear at the present time, three hundred vears after their first notice in the pages of history, so they looked them. Built of clay that has been baked by the hot rays of the sun, and located upon the banks or at least within a short distance of the Rio Grande, the villages of San Jaan, Santa Cruz, Santa Clurs. Tass, and Santo Domingo, are not only interesting in themselves, but the people who inhabit them have a curious history, which will, when understood, throw needed light upon the prehistoric races who built the castles and the trrigating ditches and the temples which still exist in ruins along the streams of the great Southwest. That there was at some time a civilization of an exceptionally high order in the Southwest, long before the discovery of America, is demonstrated in many a way. Arizona, for instance, is repiete with evidences of there having been at some long remote period a people inhabiting its limits who were not only versed in the sciences, but were so rich that the houses they brilt were spacious and costiy, and their water ditches still remain to attest to their having understood the science of agriculture.

of gol: and silver are expected to be of a good and true alloy, that is, "gold of a good and true alloy, that is, "gold of a good and true alloy, and "no vessel is to depart out of the hands of the workman until it is assayed by the workers of the goldsmiths cost," The expression "good and true alloy, and the sun, low-sinking, gave a wealth of coloring to the barren country that was indeserd ably beautiful and grand, Crossing the level curselves, and, joning a party of 4ndians who were shooting arrows at a mark, we entered the pueblo and walked about its quiet streets. There was but little coloring to be seen, save that given by the blackets which the people wore, but in the distance the mountains were resplendent in their glory, and the Rio Grande, full to overflowing, ran silently along its silvery way. As it was evening, the village was full of people, some cooking their suppers, some busy with their household duties. some busy with their household duties.

It was a pastoral scene, interesting in its simplicity, and modern Rebeccas were gathered around the water-ditch and filling their earthern jars.

A VIETUOUS, PASTORAL PEOPLE.

The people of Santo Domingo are not manufacturers, but are particularly industrious farmers. Owning a great number of acres, they raise large quantities of wheat and corn, and their flocks are numerous. With the Navajos and the Moqui they trade for whatever trinkets they need and for the blankets of bright colors which they wear. Living together with the utmost freedom, the Santo Domingans are yet noted for their virtue. Marriage is encouraged, and chitthe Santo Domingans are yet noted for their virtue. Marriage is encouraged, and chitdren are almost as numerous as the flies of summer; but there is but little illegitimacy, and the maidens, no matter how scant their clothes may be or how free their actions, bear an untarnished name. The dress of the people is plain but useful. Leather skin breeches and sandals are in vogue among the men, and the women wear short skirts and cotton cloth bodices, which do not by any means conceal the rotundity of the well-developed figures. A governor, whose means conceal the rotundity of the well-developed figures. A governor, whose power is absolute, is elected by pepular vote once a year, and the estufa, or council-chamber, is the place in which the ruler and his advisers sit. With wants that are as simple as their customs, the dwellers at Santo Domingo are far from poor. They have money on interest at Washington, which has been paid them by the Government, and the Atchison and Santa Fé road gave the tribe several thousand dollars for the right of way through the territory. The farms, which may be sand dollars for the right of way through the territory. The farms, which may be seen reaching for miles up and down the valley, are carefully worked, and the products are more than sui-fcient to not only to keep the peo-ple supplied with food, but to buy the blankets and implements of household use which may be needed. Early converts to the Catholic religion, tile people are still devoted worshippers at the church which devoted worshippers at the church which their Spanish teachers built, and in their daily dealings with those hving near them they are upright and honest. The old church, called the Cathedral, stands just on theoutskirts of the town, and is a building of no mean proportions. drawn a parased equally striking and accurate between the exceptionally sanctined chapel and the cave hewn out of the rocky side of the Hill of Myccuae, where in the same vault are yet to be seen the tomb and the treasury of the House of Atreus. Similarly, beneath the clift of the Capitoline Hill at Home, the Treasury of the Koman Commonwealth was also the shrine of the most venerable of the Italian gods—the Temple of Satura. As for the Chapel of the Pyx, it seems to have somewhat fallen from its high estate as a repository for preclous things, since at different periods it was the receptacle of the regain of the Saxon kings, the Black Rood of St. Margaret, or Holyrood-cross, from Seotland, the ampulla of Henry IV., and the sword of Wayland Smith. At a later period the Westminster Treasury was used only for the custody of the regain, the Abbey relic, the records of treaties, and the pyx or box containing the standard trial pieces of gold and silver. At the time of the Restoration the relics vanished, leaving no vestige behind. The treaties went to the Record office, and, after the Restoration, the regalia were removed to the Tower.
